"After Tiller" aired on PBS

Social media erupted following the latest in the abortion-related controversy: PBS's decision to air "After Tiller" on Labor Day.

"After Tiller" is a documentary that examines the motivations and difficulties of four late-term abortionists—LeRoy Carhart, Warren Hern, Susan Robinson, and Shelley Sella—and some of their patients, in an attempt to contextualize late-term abortion and humanize the doctors.

In the film, we are told that third-trimester abortions are less than one percent of all abortions. What we are not told is that one percent = approximately 10,000 babies in the U.S. per year.

Most of the pregnant patients featured in the film were carrying babies with severe abnormalities or disabilities, but in reality, Tiller himself admitted that this situation constituted only about eight percent of his abortions. So that means every year these doctors abort about 9,200 healthy, viable, developed babies with no health complications whatsoever.¹

Adapted from article by Kelsey Hazzard, LifeNews.com, 9/3/14.

5 things you can do to save unborn babies

- Wear the "Precious Feet" pro-life pin. Be prepared to explain pin shows actual size of a 10-12 week developing baby. See Page 9.
- Watch the Schools! If the Planned Parenthood organization has been invited into your school, perhaps to speak to a health class, ask for time for a pro-life speaker from LICL, 631-243-1435. During their presentation Planned Parenthood representatives have an opportunity to mention part or all of their pro-abortion agenda. Where there is heavy resistance from parents, districts have stopped allowing Planned Parenthood access. Parents seeking information from the website www.plannedparenthood.org are advised to use viewer discretion.
- Don't give your Breast Cancer donations to charities that support Planned Parenthood.
- Join in at least one pro-life event listed on Page 9 or elsewhere in Life News.
- Discourage the use of the term "Pro-Choice."

FEDERAL LEGISLATION

The U.S. Senate is expected to be in recess by the end of Sept. Bills passed by the House after that date could only move forward if Congress has a post-election "lame-duck" session. Any Bill not sent to the President by Dec 31 "dies," and must be reintroduced in the new Congress, after Jan 1.

The US Supreme Court is expected to hear at least one case in its upcoming term in which a religious non-profit entity opposes the HHS contraception/sterilization/abortifacient mandate. Recall that houses of worship are exempt from the mandate. Religious non-profits are, in the eyes of the Administration, 'accommodated' by making the provision of objectionable goods and services indirect through their insurers and third-party administrators - i.e., health insurers include offensive products/services "for free," but only after objection by the employer. But some say that's just 'smoke & mirrors'.

In June, in the context of for-profit, non-public companies operated by religious objectors, the US Supreme Court ruled that the mandate substantially burdens the free exercise of religion and violates the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The Court held that 'companies with closely held beliefs opposing the HHS mandate' (Hobby Lobby) must be accommodated if their owners object on religious grounds, as the mandate is not the least restrictive means to achieve the government's stated goals, assuming, for the sake of argument, that a compelling governmental interest is present.

On Aug 22, in response to the Hobby Lobby ruling, and in anticipation of upcoming arguments in the cases brought by religious non-profits, the HHS did two things: (1) it slightly tweaked the mandate for religious non-profits and (2) asked for Public Comments on "What is a closely held company?" and "How can the 'accommodation' of religious groups be applied to a closely held company?" Make Comments until Oct 21 at www.regulations.gov/#!documentDetail;D=CMS-2014-0115-0002

Note: Thank you to Tom Renker, Esq., for his generous assistance in the preparation of the information above.

HEALTH & SCIENCE

ALS and the Ice Bucket Challenge

Dr. David Prentice, Senior Fellow for Life Sciences at Family Research Council (FRC), commented on the popular ice bucket challenge on his blog at the FRC on 8/21/14 (www.frcblog.com). He encouraged donors to select organizations that participate in "ethical, successful adult stem cell research"...ALS (Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis, a.k.a. 'Lou Gehrig's Disease') is a fatal, progressive neurological disease. It attacks the nerves that control voluntary muscles, so it is sometimes termed 'motor neuron disease'. As the nerves die, muscles weaken and atrophy, including the muscles for breathing; most people suffering from ALS die of respiratory failure. The cause is unknown and at this point there is no cure, and very little that can even slow disease progression. So, raising awareness about ALS and increasing support for ALS research is a good thing.

"But whether you participate in a challenge or just donate to important research, where should your donation go? So far, most of the attention and millions of dollars in donation have gone to the ALS Association. However, the ALSA has admitted that it gives some of its money to embryonic stem cell research and has no qualms about doing so in the future...As Rebecca Taylor has pointed out, ALSA also has given money to an affiliate, NEALS, that has given money to a trial that uses stem cells derived from the spinal cord of an aborted fetus. That trial is being run by the University of Michigan and Emory University, and sponsored by a company called Neuralstem which uses aborted fetus cells for research ("from the donated spinal cord tissue of an 8-week-old aborted fetus.") All of the Neuralstem trials use cells derived from abortion. Project ALS, another charity for ALS research, also funds embryonic stem cell research.

"But there are alternatives for donations that use only ethical stem cell sources! Here are a few of my favorites: The Midwest Stem Cell Therapy Center (MSCTC) at the University of Kansas Medical center is only a year old, but is starting an increasing number of clinical trials and educational efforts. One potential future trial would be using adult stem cells for ALS. Dr. Rick Barohn, an internationally recognized expert on ALS, recently joined the Advisory Board for the Center. The MSCTC does not do any embryonic or aborted fetal stem cell research, only adult and non-embryonic stem cell research and trials." (Dr. Prentice is a member of the MSCTC advisory board.) (For more information go to www.kumc.edu/msctc.html)

Dr. Prentice notes that clinical trials are also underway at the Mayo Clinic for ALS patients using adult stem cells. Dr. Anthony Windebank is ready to begin a second clinical trial for ALS patients in association with an Israeli company, Brainstorm Cell Therapeutics.

"While this is still an experimental trial, the early results using adult stem cells for ALS treatment have been positive." (For more information go to www.mayo.edu/research/labs/regenerative-neurobiology/projects and click on Therapy for ALS) "The John Paul II Medical Research Institute in Iowa City is doing research in several areas, including ALS, and does not support embryonic stem cell research. Respect for those in a Persistent Vegetative State (PVS) Wesley J. Smith wrote on his blog (www.nationalreview.com/human-exceptionalism) on 8/21/14 regarding the use of dehumanizing terms for those who are in a PVS: "I am on a rather lonely campaign to make the V-word - 'vegetable'...unacceptable...in describing human beings. I call it 'unrepentant bigotry'...[it] dehumanizes the human beings against whom it is wielded toward the end of lowering their perceived moral value, thereby allowing them to be treated as somehow less than human...[the word vegetable] makes respectable actions that would otherwise be deemed profound wrongs, as I have repeatedly reported. Examples: we take away the food and water from such people causing them to die slowly over 10-14 days.. Bioethicists and organ transplant professionals advocate killing profoundly disabled people for their organs. Some even urge that our unconscious or minimally conscious brothers and sisters be used in medical experimentation, perhaps in place of animals...I believe that PVS is the only diagnosis that contains a pejorative. But even if one disagrees with that point, to say, "Charlie is in a PVS," is not the same thing as saying, "Charlie is a vegetable." The former describes a medical condition. The latter denigrates the human being...Thus we say someone has cancer. We don't say he is a tumor!.. Moreover the V-word is not exclusively used to describe people who are persistently unconscious (...about half of PVS diagnoses prove to be incorrect.) It is also used to denigrate those who are aware, sometimes less commonly, those with developmental disabilities, occasionally even, those with serious physical disabilities."

Smith points out that this is not a strictly religious issue. Secular disability rights groups like Not Dead Yet strongly object to the use of the term 'vegetable' to "describe those who are profoundly cognitively disabled...In conclusion, consider this: We use far more respectful language about dead people. [such as the 'late' or the 'decendent']...But you would never see a news report refer to the dead person as 'the stiff,' nor would an expert use the term in media quotes. [one of Smith's critics claims] that those who are unconscious aren't offended...How would he know?...I hear from family members of such people all the time and they are offended to hear their loved one called a V-word. And hurt. The point of the V-word is to exclude. My purpose is to help improve our language toward the end that we understand that such people are not 'them'. They are still 'us.'"
